Remembering Ryan

January 31, 2021

I lost my brother Ryan on Saturday after a difficult battle with mental illness. He was so much to me — my brother, my best friend, my cofounder. He was beautiful in all his complexity. He never did anything half-assed. Never did anything just because he was supposed to. He was a craftsman, a modern day renaissance man. He was an insanely talented developer, yet also had a brilliant eye for design. He was a true waterman, comfortable in any condition. He had such style and soul when he surfed. He was beautiful on the guitar. He had an incredible taste in music matched only by his terrible taste in movies (but in that we found so much joy together). He was stubborn. He argued. He was almost always right. He lived life unapologetically and encouraged others to do the same. He was a mentor and an influence to so many. Not because he loved to talk. Because he was a real friend who was there for you through it all. He was always up for adventure or a good time, and usually the one instigating it. We did it all together — we skydived, surfed, sailed, biked, skated, zip-lined, cliff

In my life I've gone through many phases of crystal-clear clarity followed by what I can only describe as fog, emptiness, and apathy. I don't feel crazy. I don't feel sad. I just don't feel like I have much control and in those times motivation is hard to come by.

I've never felt like I belong.

Anywhere.

I've been lucky to call many beautiful human beings my friends, but I've felt socially awkward as far back as I can remember. I'm not a weirdo (I hope? 😂) but I've often left people confused or offended by my words and actions in public (including last night when I was at Kona Brewing with some good friends of mine and tried to get a photo with one of the servers — for another friend — only to find her utterly offended that I even asked 🙄 after which I made my friends there with me feel totally awkward as they watched me apologize to her two separate times).

I have also struggled with anxiety.

I hated giving speeches in school. I have distanced myself from lifelong friends for fear they may ask me to give a speech at their wedding as their best-man. I sabotaged my brother's desire to apply to Techstars and Y Combinator when we started Kumu years ago, for fear we may get selected and — god forbid — I have
